

- ◆ writing break
- ◆ New York in April
- ◆ non-action in new order

Dear friends,

for a few months the messenger hasn't delivered any news. That's because I have been writing other things. Which left neither resources nor would I have been able to tell you any other things than that I was writing. There were a few concerned inquiries missing the news. Writing sometimes brings the solitude to the doorstep, although I went off to my favorite café most of the time, so I was glad you inquired.

the Times Square book was finished one morning last year in July, but was yet a dream at that time. Now it is written in flesh, and sent off to some publishers, and it remains to see whether it will find its way out into the world. It is not exclusively about Times Square and all the things I did and watched there in the past years. It is about a few more things, maybe everything, no-thing and infinity. At any rate Goethe is in it and the visionary art. And once again something comes to an end and something new will begin. If you want to go back into the project that originated in a vision in 2005, please visit the website www.dayofthearts.com and the travel log www.dayofthearts08.blogspot.com

non-action in New York – April on Broadway

Times Square has been widely carfree for a year, but I had to check whether reality holds true to the promise of the media. Seeing directly and without filter means seeing for yourself, among other things. In April I went back and for a walk on Broadway. Everything is as stated, only different and maybe better. One half of the Great White Way belongs to the slow modes of traffic: pedestrians and cyclists. All previously provisional changes are now permanent and set in stone. In Times Square the city put up their feet, and everyone sits back in the street furniture while the sun shines on hats and faces. Times Square is but the tip of a city-wide traffic calming iceberg. Radical changes wherever you look. There are some of them in the travel log if you want to check: www.dayofthearts08.blogspot.com

The art of doing nothing in public places to be continued. Most of the beheld places of past years are now ordered in order of their appearance starting with the most recent. Some are English, some German, and some in both languages. For you to read and check: www.silkeschilling.com/non-action-art

Fine art prints of most of my visionary and healing art are available on excellent artist papers and canvas. Please visit: www.silkeschilling.com/shop
